No, it's not how can I meet a person who writes a DivX blog? It sounds amazing! (Good guess, though. The question we get more than any other about registering a DivX Certified Device. There are thousands of different types of DivX devices - from TVs and Blu-ray players to car players and home theater systems - that we have tested to ensure the playback of various video formats, including DivX files. Scroll through the on-screen interface for these devices (and included in the user manual) contains information about the device's registration to play the purchased DivX video. Following the instructions to register the device is a fairly simple process that involves copying the file to a drive or USB stick and playing it on your Certified DivX device. (Here's a nitty gritty on how to register a device or how-to-video on the subject.) DivX devices (see above) and the device's user interface with VOD code (see below). But wait ... Do you really need to do that? The key word above is purchased. If you purchased a divX movie or show up online, then, yes, you will need to register to play it back on your device (such as TV, Blu-ray player, etc.). If your content is downloaded from the Internet or it's a video you've created, you don't need to register your device to play the file. This means that the vast majority of users can enjoy their videos (DivX or other popular formats) through their DivX Certified device without going through the registration process. Bottom line: If you have a device with the DivX logo on it, you can play back different popular video formats without any extra effort. If you have purchased a DivX video/show, you will need to register your device. If you haven't made a purchase yet, you don't need to register first. Start enjoying the video!
