Friendly warning! We work hard to be precise. But this is an unusual time, so please make sure the seats remain open. Bluff Island is one of the Ung Kong Islands located within the Hong Kong Global Geopark. It is said to look like a tortoise from above and boasts one of the largest sea caves in the area, Fan Tap Pai. Open explorers tend to loop in a Bluff Island tour with the nearby island of Basalt, taking in striking cliff faces, Jurassic rock formations and more along the way. Maybe no one says these actual words in the new Kong trailer: Skull Island, but the two-and-a-half minute teaser for the upcoming creature feature is no doubt permeated by Spielberg's sense of wonder, terror and awesome scale. Making for tropical islands what Jaws did for the ocean, Skull Island drops a boatload of famous faces - including a seemingly half-Marvel Cinematic Universe with Loki (Tom Hiddleston), Captain Marvel (Brie Larson), Nick Fury (Samuel L. Jackson), and Nova Corpsman Romann Day (John C. Reilly) all on board - in the wilds of the titular archipelago, where they will be forced to fend off the titular archipelago. , prequel, reboot or remake? The last time a giant monkey appeared on the big screen was in 2005 in the adventures of Peter Jackson King Kong , starring Naomi Watts, Adrien Brody, and Jack Black. It's been more than 11 years since the film's release by the time Skull Island premieres in March 2017, but it's not an unheard of amount of time that should pass between parts of the franchise. (Damn, 2015 Mad Max: Fury Road took where the Thunderdome left off 30 years ago.) But there is one problem with the idea of Skull Island being a sequel to King Kong: the fact that the titular monster died at the end of Jackson's film, felled from the top of the Empire State Building. It is unlikely when it comes to time travel; While the 2005 film took place in the 1930s, a new version is set decades later, in the 1970s. So, does Skull Island have anything in common with a version of Jackson's story? This may seem strange given how critically acclaimed and commercially successful King Kong has been - winning three Oscars this year for its impressive technical achievements - but Skull Island will ignore Jackson's full reboot event, existing as the start of the new Kong series. The only question that remains is if Skull Island itself is a remake of the previous Kong film, or whether it is brand new Franchise. Including Jackson's take, there were seven King Kong feature films preceding Skull Island, dating back to the 1933 original original Kong's stop-motion and iconic screaming queen Faye Wray), including the 1976 remake (featuring a climax battle atop the World Trade Center, not the Empire State Building and Jessica Lange in the first film of her career). However, Skull Island is not a remake of any of these films - not Son of Kong or King Kong Shoots or even King Kong Life. This is an original take on the classic story, which is designed to serve as the basis of a new common universe between a massive monkey and another iconic giant monster: Godzilla. Skull Island will take place in the same cinematic universe as Godzilla's 2014 reboot; After its release next March, there will be a sequel to Godzilla due out in 2019, followed by a franchise of climate mash-ups in 2020: Godzilla vs. Kong.Legendary, the studio behind the recent Godzilla and Kong reboots, announced those plans in October 2015, and teased that the franchise would eventually include other famous creatures like King Guilder, and Rodan. Of course, all these plans are probably banking on the financial success of Skull Island. It's fortunate that the studio has put together such an impressive cast, and that the new trailer is so promising, featuring an array of momentum-pounding action, eye-popping design creatures... and comedic relief, courtesy of Reilly.You'll be able to see Loki and captain the Marvel team against King Kong when Skull Island hits theaters March 10, 2017.Images: Warner Bros. Pictures Learn how to make your own crystal skull, on Halloween, Day of the Dead, or just decorate your space. It's a simple crystal-growing project that produces an interesting conversation piece. We have chosen the borer to grow the crystal skull, but you can use any crystal recipe. One interesting option might be to grow the sugar crystal skull and place it in a bowl of shock. BoraxBoiling waterSmall paper skull (I got mine in Michael's craft store) Bowl deep enough to hold the skull make sure the bowl is deep enough to hold the skull. Pour the boil or very hot water into the bowl. Stir in the storm until it stops to dissolve. This project looks cool with clear crystals, but if you like, you can add food coloring to color the skull crystals. Place the skull in a bowl of crystallist of this solution. The paper or cardboard skulls take some time to absorb the liquid so that the skull can float for a while. It's good and usually decides on its own, but you can weight down the skull with a glass or other bowl if it bobs too much. Another option is to turn the skull periodically to make sure that all surfaces are exposed to fluid. Check the growth of the crystal every couple of hours. You should have a good harvest of crystals within an hour to the night, depending on how saturated your solution was and how it cools down. When satisfied with the crystals, remove the skull and place it on a paper towel to dry. If you want even more crystals on the skull, take a crystal skull and place it in a fresh solution to get second layer of crystalline growth. Make sure the new solution is saturated (more borax won't dissolve) or you run the risk of dissolving some crystals rather than growing anymore. While there are local conservation groups in the city who are working hard to keep this cultural aspect alive, not many know or understand the work that goes beyond the plugs of these glowing signs that light up our streets. So, we visited Au Yeung Cheong, the acclaimed calligraphy and authentic Chinese master of font signage, which has kept the tradition alive for more than 40 years. Andrea Wong's Brilliant Tailor Shop, one of the last two remaining tenants inside the State Theatre's Once-Landmark and Fame North Point, the 68-year-old State Theater Building is the kind of place that will give you goosebumps a moment when you step into the building. Clouded in an eerie atmosphere throughout the room - most likely due to huge empty spaces, empty shops, and the sounds of reverberations of water leaking - the dimly lit building is a jarring contrast to the bustling streets of the North Point area. If you go further into the building, you will see the two remaining tenants tucked into the back, one of which is a traditional tailor shop, and the other surrounded by illuminated signage and plastic signs where Au Yeung Cheong and his king wah Signboards store (京華招牌) resides. Having studied calligraphy through books such as Tung Shing (traditional lunar calendars) and Buddhist scriptures given by his father in his youth, Au Yeung Cheong is a good example of the practice makes perfect. Au Yeung did not have the best tools available to master his craft, however, he did do with what he had without any complaints and stubbornly to become an apprentice in numerous signage shops before opening King Va in the 80s. With decades of practiced precision, each punch is as sharp as a knife, or, he says, as sharp as a knife you'd use to cut a winter melon. His workshop is ragged, dirty, materials and tools scattered throughout the site (some of his works are littered with littered stairs that lead to the basement of the building) - the setting may seem chaotic, but it was not always so. In the prime of his career, he had four stores in the State Theatre Building, about 20 employees, and he lived a rather luxurious lifestyle without worrying about the lack of money. Back then I never worried about whether I was doing enough. If I ever run out of cash, I know I always have money in the bank. I also had a maid and I will always play mahjong after work around 2pm. The merciless fire at the State Theatre in 1995 burned all his work and efforts into ashes, leaving him no choice but to lay off all his employees, sell his home and continue his journey as a one-man band to provide for his three children. Now what's left of his shop is also his home - where he has his own food, paints in his spare time, all the while doing what he does best by making traditional signage. Au Yeung is proud of his craft and he does not shy away from complimenting his own skills. These computers can't do what I do, he explains. Machine fonts are not so clean and can not replenish my authentic calligraphy. Most are just a generic copy of the real deal that lacks character, they're just there for cockroaches, he adds. While some may call him brash and arrogant, frankly, his success and legacy give him the full bragging rights. When asked what his most notable work is, he simply says: If you look above you on the streets, most of the signs are probably written by me. Even those opposite this building are made by me. With his shop becoming a hot Instagrammable spot, Au Yeung seems utterly unfazed by those who only want to snap a pic for a few likes on social media. The store's installation feels like it's designed for people to freely photograph its work, with stools and tables set up, signs scattered in messy fashion, and lit signs that created a warm and bright corner against the backdrop of the dark and empty spaces of the State Theatre. During our interview, there is a photographer with a photo shoot with a model, and a whole film crew shooting a clip with piano and erhu plays a few steps from his shop, but he is never bothered or annoyed. Why should I be annoyed? If everyone can see my craft online, then they will know how great my craft is. Throughout our visit, he made sure we marked down every response and anecdote properly and even suggested for us to take off the tour he gave around the store-10 of 10 items for hospitality! Business was slow during our visit. Au wrote three signs for only one customer, with words and phrases of their choice, charging $400 in total. In between intricate strokes made in red ink and without hesitation, he tried conversation between us and his client, even sharing fragments of his work, the paintings he made in his spare time, and he took with his clients (he often asks his client to take a picture with him as a keepsake). Au Yeung worries that no one will take over his business and continue his legacy. However, it still hopes and continues to provide mini-lessons for any visitors who are interested to learn the craft. One of Au Yeung's wishes is to have authentic Chinese fonts and signage distributed around the world. As long as there is a place with these authentic Chinese fonts, it will stand the test of time and survive forever, - he admires. With no successor inheriting his calling, it is a pity that eventually have to say goodbye to this authentic craft when Au Yeung decides to retire. According to Au, he will eventually move his shop to Metro City Plaza in Tseung Kwan O. So, for those interested, pay Au Yeung a visit to his old store in the State Theater building before he transfers, chat with the man himself, and learn more about his life story and support his passion for one of Hong Kong's oldest crafts.
